Recap Thursday

- What are attitudes?
 - Evaluative response
 - Directed to an attitude object
 - Derived from 3 classes of info: cognitive, affective, behavioral
- Self-perception theory
- Explicit versus implicit attitudes
 - And how to measure them

Why do people hold attitudes?

Attitudes will help consumers to separate good from bad.
Decide whether to approach or avoid something.

Different functions can drive attitudes.

Understanding the purpose of a consumer's attitude is an imperative step toward changing an attitude.

Function theory

Adjustment function

Maximize rewards and minimize penalties

Value-expressive function

Reflect values that are important to them or that they perceive as socially important to others

Ego-defensive function

Protect our self-esteem

Knowledge function

Need frames of reference for understanding the world; help us organize a chaotic world

Assignment #3 - attitudes

For this assignment, you need to find two ads for the same product category (not necessarily the same brand) that are trying to appeal to two different functions.

In a report (double-spaced, approx. 500-750 words), respond to the following items:

1. Briefly describe the two advertisements you selected. Remember, they should be in the same product category, but they should appeal to different functions.
2. For each advertisement, briefly describe which functions (one for each) you think each ad is appealing to and why.
3. Which functional appeal do you think is more effective in this product category. Why?

DEADLINE: March 5, 2:30 pm (before class starts)

Are attitudes stable or do they change?

'Attitude strength'

The stability of attitudes

Four attributes of strong attitudes:

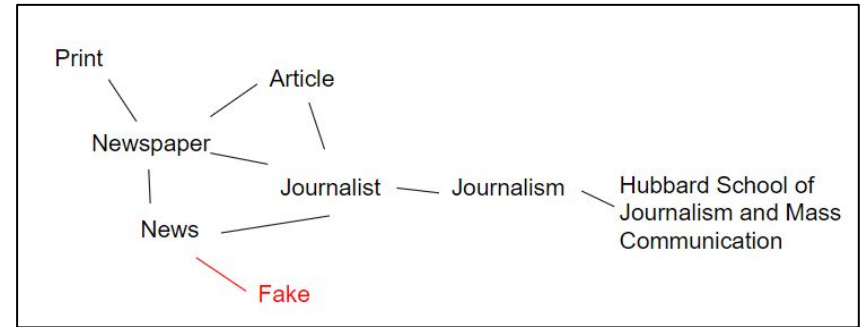

1. Strong attitudes have higher stability over time
2. Greater impact on behavior
3. Greater influence on information processing
4. Greater resistance to persuasion

Determinants of attitude strength

- Accessibility
- Importance
- Knowledge
- Certainty
- Ambivalence

Accessibility

How easy or quickly an attitude can be retrieved from memory

Node: activated easily

More accessible =

- Stronger influence on information processing
- Stronger influence on behavior

Example: Brand awareness

Measure through response time. Accessible takes less time.

Attitude importance

How important it is to you personally

How concerned you are about it

How relevant the attitude object is to you.

Attitude knowledge

How much information you have about the issue

Should be able to better evaluate the information presented

Attitude certainty

Confidence individuals have in the validity or correctness of their own attitude.

Ambivalence

State in which an individual gives an attitude object equivalently strong positive or negative evaluation.

In other words, we like and hate at the same time. You find yourself torn...

Not the same as neutral!

Less predictive of behavior.

Ambivalence

How positive?

How negative?

How ambivalence could help persuasion

Easier to change through persuasion, but also evidence to the contrary.

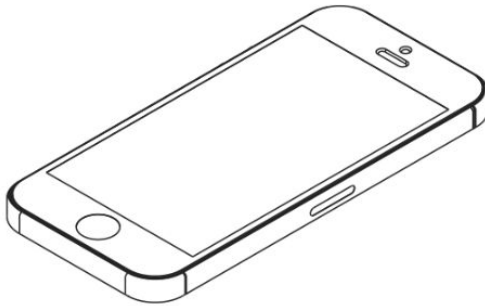

1. If you have a two-sided argument and recipient must formulate opinion.
2. They will work harder to do so (effortful), elaborate more.
3. Elaboration (extended processing) is associated with high levels of persuasion
4. Thus, more elaboration more persuasion (see studies in book)

Determinants of attitude strength

In sum...

- Accessibility
- Importance
- Knowledge
- Certainty
- Ambivalence
